As in previous books (Baseball in April, 1990; Taking Sides, 1991), Soto shows a mainstream audience that the lives of middle-class Hispanics resemble their own. Ultimately, however, the story is unsatisfying: Miata rescues the old skirt to avoid a lecture, not because the garment embodies a sense of time, culture, or tradition for her.

The folkórico skirt is a representation of Mexican culture. Miata is celebrating her Mexican heritage by participating in the dance. On occasion, Soto uses Spanish words when a character speaks or to describe something. This adds authenticity to the text as the characters speak in both Spanish and English.
